HISTORICAL KASKASKIA

Kaskaskia has been the scene of interesting historical events. It has also been the occasion of much confusion and misunderstanding. In speaking of Kaskaskia, one must bear in mind that there were six distinct Kaskaskias; or, perhaps more accurately, the same "Kaskaskia" was to be found, at six different points of time, in six different locations.

The first Kaskaskia was situated on the upper Illinois River, near the spot where the town of Utica, Illinois, now stands (across the Illinois River from "Starved Rock").

The second Kaskaskia (formed by a change of location of the first Kaskaskia) stood some fifty miles farther down the Illinois River, at the southern end of "Lake Peoria", near the present site of Peoria, Illinois.

The third Kaskaskia (which was the second Kaskaskia -- or at least the greater part of it -- moved to a different location) stood at the confluence of the Des Peres River with the Mississippi, at a site which is now on the southern city limits of St. Louis, Missouri.

The fourth Kaskaskia (representing again a transmigration from the third Kaskaskia) was located on the western bank of the Kaskaskia River about four miles above (north of) its confluence with the Mississippi River, some five or six miles north of the present city of Chester, Illinois.

The fifth Kaskaskia was formed when the Kaskaskia Indians left the fourth Kaskaskia (which, in their opinion, was becoming over-crowded with Frenchmen) and established their village several miles farther up the Kaskaskia River (north of the fourth Kaskaskia). This fifth Kaskaskia was often referred to as Indian Kaskaskia, while the fourth Kaskaskia -- after the departure of the Indians -- became known as French Kaskaskia.

The sixth Kaskaskia was formed when floodwaters (as early as 1835 and 1844, but especially since the great flood of 1881) began to wash away French Kaskaskia. Some of the inhabitants of French Kaskaskia, when driven out by the floodwaters, established themselves several miles to the south; and thus arose the present town of Kaskaskia, which is the sixth Kaskaskia.

The First Kaskaskia, 1673-1691

About the end of May or the beginning of June, 1673, Father Claude Allouez, S.J., left his headquarters at St. Francis Xavier Mission near Green Bay and made the "six days' journey" to Kaskaskia, where a numerous group of Illinois Indians (mostly Kaskaskia Indians, but also some Peoria Indians and Miamis) had a village on the Illinois River directly across from "Starved Rock". While he was there, a band of Peoria Indians, who had been encamped on the west bank of the Mississippi River (in present Iowa) and there were visited by the Jolliet exploring expedition in the latter part of June, 1673, returned to their former habitat on the Illinois River and there informed Father Allouez that the Jolliet exploring party planned to return to Green Bay by way of the Illinois River.

Father Allouez was not at all interested in the Jolliet expedition, which was a purely civil enterprise, and had managed to avoid meeting the explorers when they passed through the Green Bay area in the latter part of May. He was equally solicitous to avoid meeting them at Kaskaskia, and so he determined to return to his headquarters, St. Francis Xavier Mission near Green Bay, before the Jolliet exploring party would reach Kaskaskia. The length of Father Allouez's stay and activity at Kaskaskia was some eight or ten weeks, from the early part of June to the middle of August, 1673.

For his two months of missionary activity at Kaskaskia, Father Allouez could report worth-while achievements. At the very beginning of his next annual report (covering the period from June, 1673 to June, 1674), Father Allouez testifies: "I have already visited the Caskakias [Kaskaskia Indians] and have baptized many of their children; I have borne the first words of the Faith to the Peoualeas [Peoria Indians] who dwell among the Miamis, and they have listened to me with much docility."

The old claim that Jacques Marquette, S.J., founded the Kaskaskia Mission and was the first to say Holy Mass there in April, 1675, is completely at variance with the above-quoted testimony of Father Allouez. It was Father Claude Allouez, S.J., who first visited Kaskaskia in June, 1673; and inasmuch as he remained there for about two months -- long enough to "baptize many of their children" and to win the confidence and good will of the Peoria Indians to such an extent that "they have listened to me with much docility" -- it can be safely assumed that he also said the first Holy Mass at Kaskaskia some time in June, 1673.

Shortly after Father Allouez's departure, the Jolliet exploring expedition reached Kaskaskia in late August or early September and they tarried there for three days.

In 1677, Father Allouez was officially put in charge of the Kaskaskia Mission, and he remained active in this general area (Kaskaskias, Peorias, Miamis) for the next twelve years until his death among the Miamis in 1689. It was during Father Allouez's administration of the Kaskaskia Mission that La Salle and Tonti erected (1682-83) Fort St. Louis atop Starved Rock. Father Allouez was succeeded in 1689 by an equally zealous and energetic missionary, Father Jacques Gravier, S.J.

The Second Kaskaskia, 1691-1700

After La Salle's death, Henri de Tonti was placed in charge of Fort St. Louis. Since the Illinois Indians had previously manifested a desire to abandon their village near Starved Rock "because the fire-wood was remote and because it was so difficult to get water upon the Rock if they were attacked", Tonti inquired whether they still had plans to move the village and where they intended to establish themselves. The Indians chose to move some fifty miles down the Illinois River, to Lake Pimitoui, later also known as Lake Peoria. This area had already for many years been their winter hunting grounds.

Tonti promptly cooperated with this plan. He arrived at Lake Pimitoui in the winter of 1691 and at once began building a fort to which the Indians might repair for protection in case of a hostile invasion. The fort, sometimes called Fort St. Louis but more frequently named Fort Pimitoui, was completed in 1692, and it was garrisoned by a large number of French soldiers. Around the fort a French settlement soon sprang up. The population of the Indian village appears to have been about four or five thousand.

Father Pierre François Charlevoix, S.J., has left us a vivid description of this location. He writes as follows:

"The third of October about noon we found ourselves at the entrance of the Lake Pimitoui; it is the river which grows wider here, and which for three leagues is one league in breadth. At the end of these three leagues, we find on the right a second village of the Illinois, distant about fifteen leagues from that of the Rock. Nothing can be more pleasant than its situation; it has over against it, as in perspective, a very fine forest, which was then of all colors, and behind it a plain of immense extent, bordered with woods. The lake and the river swarm with fish, and their sides with wild-fowl."

When Father Charlevoix visited this village in 1721, the "Illinois" dwelling there were the Peoria Indians; for the Kaskaskia Indians had left this area about twenty-one years before. Father Charlevoix's description tallies with Father Mermet's reference to the Peoria Indians as "Illinois de Detroit" ("Illinois of the Narrows"), because their village was located near the place where the Illinois River, after having for a distance of about eight miles expanded to a width of over two miles to form Lake Peoria, again "narrowed" down to its normal width.

Father Gravier employs the same designation repeatedly in his letter of February 16, 1701:

"I arrived too late among the Illinois of the Narrows, of whom Father Marest has charge, to prevent the migration of the Village of the Kaskaskia. . . . I do not think that the Kaskaskia would have separated from the Peoria and from the other Illinois of the Narrows, if I could have arrived sooner. . . . May God grant that the road from Chikagoua to the Narrows be not closed, and that the entire Illinois Mission may not suffer greatly thereby."

The Sieur de Liettes, who lived at Fort Pimitoui for seven years, describes the daily routine of the missionaries:

"Every day, as soon as the sun rises, they go about among the cabins to find out if anyone is sick; they give them medicines, and if necessary bleed them, and sometimes even they make broth for them. After which they have it cried through the village that they are about to say Mass. Then they teach the catechism or they preach sermons. In the afternoon, after having applied themselves to the language, they return to the village to teach the catechism, which always takes two hours. The pieces of wood, husks of Indian corn, and even stones which are thrown at them do not dismay them; they continue their cries, contenting themselves with saying that it is the Master of life who orders them to do what they are doing, and that those who wish to listen to His word may follow while those who do not wish to hear it may stay away. In the evening they come again to call to prayer, which is followed by a prayer-service for the French. No weather prevents them from going through with the same exercises. Sometimes they are sent for at night to come to the edge of the village, which is more than an eighth of a league long, to assist the dying."

The missionaries active at the Peoria village during this period (1691-1700) were the Jesuit Fathers Jacques Gravier, Sebastien Rasle, Julien Bineteau, and Gabriel Marest. Father Gravier was in charge of the Peoria, or "second Kaskaskia" mission from 1691 till 1696. For about a year (1692-1693) he was assisted by Father Rasle. When Father Gravier was named Superior of all the Ottawa missions in 1696, Father Bineteau took charge of the Peoria mission. He was joined, two years later, in 1698, by Father Marest. When his three-year (1696-1699) term as Superior of all the Ottawa missions had expired, Father Gravier returned to the Peoria mission, arriving there when the Kaskaskia Indians were already on the point of setting out for Louisiana.

The Third Kaskaskia, 1700-1703

In the spring of 1699, Le Moyne d'Iberville, commanding two hundred soldiers and colonists, occupied the southernmost reaches of the Mississippi River and laid the foundation of what became known as Louisiana. About the same time, on the Illinois River, it was rumored that the Kaskaskia Indians were planning to abandon their village at Lake Peoria and to join the Iberville forces in Louisiana. In Illinois the Indians were fearing an invasion by the warlike Fox Indians, while from the East the Iroquois were a constant threat.

In September, 1700, the Kaskaskia Indians, numbering about twelve hundred souls, followed their Chief, Rouensa by name and an exemplary Christian, ostensibly for Louisiana. The migrating tribe was accompanied by Father Gravier and Father Marest. When they reached Tamaroa, on the eastern bank of the Mississippi River, directly across from the site of the present city of St. Louis, Missouri, the influence of Father Gravier produced a halt in the southward migration of the Kaskaskia Indians.

On reaching Tamaroa, Father Marest fell ill. Father Jean Bergier, a priest of the Quebec Seminary of Foreign Missions who was then in charge of the Tamaroa Mission, cordially invited Father Marest to remain at the Mission until he recovered sufficiently to proceed on his journey to the South. So Father Marest remained at Tamaroa and enjoyed the hospitality of Father Bergier, while Father Gravier left for Louisiana to meet and consult with d'Iberville.

When the Kaskaskia Indians reached Tamaroa, they found assembled there, in addition to a group of French settlers and traders, three different tribes of the Illinois confederacy -- all told, perhaps some two thousand souls. The three tribes were the Tamaroas, the Cahokias, and the Metchigamias, the village of the last-named tribe being located about fifty miles farther south on the Metchigamia (eventually to be known as the Kaskaskia) River.

It may have been the large assembly of Indians at Tamaroa that prompted Rouensa, the Chief of the Kaskaskia Indians, to have the twelve hundred Indians comprising his tribe cross the Mississippi River and establish themselves, about five miles farther south, on the north bank of the Des Peres River, near where it empties into the Mississippi River. The site they occupied is today at the southern city limits of St. Louis, Missouri.

Chief Rouensa moved his Indians to the west bank of the Mississippi River undoubtedly with the knowledge and approval of Father Gravier who, as is evident from what eventually ensued, had no intention of settling the Kaskaskia Indians, jointly with d'Iberville's plan, at the mouth of the Mississippi River. Attracted and invited by Rouensa, the majority of the Tamaroa Indians soon joined the Kaskaskias on the Des Peres River. Thus, after the Metchigamias returned to their village fifty miles to the south, Father Bergier was left alone with the Cahokia Indians at Tamaroa. It was probably due to this circumstance that the area on the east side of the Mississippi River opposite the present city of St. Louis, which had hitherto been known as Tamaroa, was subsequently called Cahokia.

The Kaskaskia Indians remained at the Des Peres River about two and a half years. During this time three Jesuit missionaries labored there. They were Fathers Gabriel Marest, Jean Baurie, and François Pinet. Twice during this time the Jesuits at the Des Peres River contemplated penetrating into the interior, notably the Sioux country, by way of the Missouri River. However, both attempts came to naught.

It was apparently at the close of the year 1701 that Father Baurie set out on a missionary expedition to the habitat of the Sioux Indians. He had proceeded fifty miles up the Missouri River when for some reason the expedition was wrecked and Father Baurie was compelled to return to the Des Peres River. In 1702, Father Baurie returned to France.

On July 5, 1702, Father Pinet, who had been working with Father Bergier at Tamaroa, left Tamaroa and crossed the Mississippi River in order to take charge of the Kaskaskia and Tamaroa Indians at the Des Peres River and thus release Father Marest, who was planning to make a missionary trip to the Sioux country. But sudden death on August 1, 1702, took away Father Pinet and left Father Marest in sole charge of the Mission at the Des Peres River.

The Fourth Kaskaskia, 1703-1719

In the spring of 1703, Chief Rouensa with his Kaskaskia Indians and the Tamaroa Indians who had joined them, left their habitat at the mouth of the Des Peres River and migrated about sixty miles south, where they established their village on the west bank of the Metchigamia (now Kaskaskia) River, about four miles above its confluence with the Mississippi, -- at a point where the Metchigamia River at that time approached to within about two miles of the Mississippi River. This event is duly recorded in the Baptismal Register of the Kaskaskia Mission. Immediately following the baptismal entry for April 13, 1703, there is inscribed this statement: "On April 25, 1703, we arrived on the bank of the river called Metchigamia" ("Ad ripam Metchigamia dictam venimus").

The reason for this migration is not expressly indicated, but it can easily be inferred. Father Bergier, Pastor of Cahokia, in a letter dated July 3, 1703, wrote: "All the French who were here, afraid of being killed or plundered [by the Sioux Indians], are abandoning the village [Cahokia] and going some to Pere Maretz's [Marest's] mission twenty-five leagues lower down the River of the Metchigamias, others to the Ouabache [Ohio] with a view to safety." Father Bergier's mention of the Ouabache or Ohio River has reference to the French settlement established in 1702 by Charles Juchereau on the Ohio River about five miles above its mouth. Two years later, in 1704, an epidemic ravaged the settlement and carried off many of the settlers, including Charles Juchereau himself. Thereupon the settlement was abandoned, most of the survivors going to Mobile. Father Jean Mermet, S.J., who had been the Chaplain of Juchereau's settlement on the Ohio River, returned to Kaskaskia.

If the French settlers at Cahokia migrated towards the south for fear of "being killed or plundered" by the Sioux Indians, it appears reasonable to assume that the Kaskaskia Indians migrated out of the same motive. The Kaskaskia Indians were a peace-loving tribe who were ever ready to forsake their habitat and seek a place of security elsewhere, whenever any hostile tribe threatened to attack them. It had been the threat of a hostile invasion by the Fox Indians that induced the Kaskaskias to abandon their village at Lake Peoria in 1700; it was very likely the danger of attack by the Sioux Indians that impelled them in 1703 to abandon their village on the Des Peres River.

It should also be noted that Father Marest and the Kaskaskia Indians met some of the Metchigamia Indians at Tamaroa-Cahokia in 1700. Perhaps already at that time the Metchigamia Indians extended to them an invitation to come and settle near their village on the Metchigamia River.

The sixteen-year period from 1703 to 1719 marked the golden age of the Kaskaskia Mission. The missionaries active at Kaskaskia during this period were:

1) Father Gabriel Marest, S.J., who came with the Kaskaskia Indians when they migrated from the Des Peres River to the Kaskaskia River. He remained at Kaskaskia till his death in 1714.

2) Father Jean Mermet, S.J., who accompanied the Charles Juchereau expedition to the Ohio River in 1702 and remained there till the abandonment of that post in 1704. Thereupon he came to Kaskaskia and remained there till his death in 1716.

3) Father Jean Marie de Ville, S.J., who was assigned to the Illinois Mission in 1707 but found his passage blocked at the time and did not reach his destination until about 1711. Shortly after reaching Kaskaskia he was sent to the Peoria mission for two years, 1712-1714. He returned to Kaskaskia in 1714 and remained there till 1719, when he journeyed to Mobile to consult with Governor Bienville. He never returned to Kaskaskia, but died the following year, June 15, 1720, at Natchez.

Christianity was in a flourishing condition at Kaskaskia. Father Gravier, in a letter dated March 6, 1707, testified that of the total population of 2200, only forty or fifty were not Christians. Many of the Frenchmen (some of them from Cahokia) who settled at Kaskaskia married Indian women, as is evident from the entries in the Baptismal Register of that time. For of the infants that were baptized between the years 1701 and 1713, eighty per cent are recorded as having a French father and an Indian mother.

There was a large church in the village, where most of the Indians gathered three times every day: in the morning for Holy Mass, in the afternoon for Catechism instruction, in the evening for prayers and hymns. In between these church services, the missionaries would make their daily rounds of the village, visiting the sick and consoling the sorrowing. On Sundays there was High Mass in the morning, and in the afternoon Vespers, at which the French chanted in Latin and the Indians responded in Illinois.

But even during this golden age, Kaskaskia was not free of all troubles. While the resident French lived in peace and harmony with the Indians, freely intermarrying with them, the French traders from Canada were a frequent source of disturbance. By their life of debauchery they were a grave scandal to the Christians, and they caused frequent disorders by inciting the Indian tribes to war upon each other in order thus to secure slaves to sell to the English. Several times (in 1708, 1711, 1719) the missionary had to appeal to Governor Bienville for military intervention to quell the irregularities of these French-Canadian traders.

The most tragic period was the summer of 1714, when a very ravaging epidemic carried away several hundred persons, among them the missionary in charge, Father Gabriel Marest, S.J., who died on September 15, 1714. Father Mermet then took charge of the Kaskaskia mission for the next two years, but he also died, on September 15, 1716. Thereupon Father Ville was in charge till 1719.

The Fifth Kaskaskia, 1719-1795

In 1718 the energetic Pierre Boishbriant became the Commandant of the Illinois country. In December, 1718, he arrived at Kaskaskia (from New Orleans) with a flotilla of ten canoes carrying army officers, government officials, working-men, and a hundred soldiers.

To protect the country against attacks by hostile Indians or by the Spaniards, he resolved to erect a fort on the east bank of the Mississippi River some sixteen miles north of Kaskaskia. About two years (1719-1721) were required to complete this fort, which was then named Fort Chartres. While the fort was under construction, the army officers and soldiers were lodged in the town of Kaskaskia.

Partly on account of this crowded condition and partly due to Boishbriant's plan to separate the Indians from the French, the Kaskaskia Indians withdrew from the town, migrated some five miles towards the north and there established themselves on the west bank of the Kaskaskia River. This Indian settlement became the fifth Kaskaskia, and it is often referred to as Indian Kaskaskia to distinguish it from French Kaskaskia, as the fourth Kaskaskia was called after the departure of the Indians.

Although there is no direct testimony to this effect, the Jesuits must have erected -- at their own expense -- a church in this Indian Kaskaskia; for in 1726 they asked the Commandant to reimburse them for the expenses they had incurred in building this church. For over forty years this Indian settlement flourished under the care of the Jesuit missionaries. When in 1763 the Jesuits were expelled from the country, Father Sebastien Meurin, S.J., who for the past twenty years had ministered to these Indians, was also forced to leave.

But before he sailed from New Orleans, the urgent appeal of the Indians prevailed upon the civil authorities to permit Father Meurin to return to the Illinois country; -- a permission which the civil authorities conceded only with the provision that henceforth he would function as a diocesan priest, and not as a Jesuit. And so Father Meurin returned to the Illinois country for the remaining thirteen years of his life. He was stationed successively at Ste. Genevieve (1764-- 1767), Cahokia (1767-1768), and Prairie du Rocher (1768-1777). While at the last-named place, Father Meurin was only a short distance from his beloved Indians of Kaskaskia.

How long Indian Kaskaskia continued to exist after the death of Father Meurin in 1777, it is difficult to determine. In 1795, when Father Pierre Janin was sent by Bishop Carroll to take charge of Kaskaskia (that is, French Kaskaskia), there was still an Indian mission attached to this Parish. This Indian mission was very likely Indian Kaskaskia. But soon after this date the Kaskaskia Indians seem to have begun drifting westward, for around the year 1835 we find a remnant of them on the Osage River in western Missouri.

French Kaskaskia, 1719-1894

After the Kaskaskia Indians had departed in 1719 to establish their own village about five miles farther north, French Kaskaskia (which is merely a continuation of the fourth Kaskaskia) became a French parish. This change in ecclesiastical status is noted in the Baptismal Register, which in 1719 entered a new title heading: "Register of Baptisms performed in the Church of the Mission and in the Parish of the Conception." ("Registre des Baptêmes faits dans l'église de la Mission et dans la Paroisse de la Conception").

With the advent of government officials, military leaders, and wealthy merchants, there began at French Kaskaskia a social life that strove to rival, on a modest scale, the gay life of the royal court at Versailles. In fact, during the middle of the eighteenth century, French Kaskaskia is sometimes referred to as the "Versailles of the West". The town became so well known not only in America but also in France, that it captured the fancy of the King of France, Louis XV, who in the year 1741 presented Kaskaskia with a church-bell which is still preserved today.

This bell was cast by Normand in the seaport town of La Rochelle in France in 1741. It weighs 600 pounds and bears the inscription: "Pour l'église des Illinois par les soins du roi d'outre-leau." ("For the Church of the Illinois, with the compliments of the King from beyond the sea"). This bell was in use until the year 1873. Then new bells (cast in St. Louis) were procured and the old French bell was stored away in an old building which later crumbled under the impact of the flood-waters of the Mississippi River. The bell was recovered in 1918 and brought to New Kaskaskia. In 1948 the State of Illinois erected a shrine (a beautiful brick structure) which now houses this "Liberty Bell of the West".

It was this French Kaskaskia that George Rogers Clark captured for the Americans during the Revolutionary War. Father Pierre Gibault was Pastor of Kaskaskia at that time. As a matter of fact, Father Gibault had charge of the entire Illinois mission, including Kaskaskia, Ste. Genevieve, Prairie du Rocher, Cahokia, and Vincennes; but at the time of Clark's expedition (1778) his headquarters were at Kaskaskia. The French inhabitants of Kaskaskia were at first very much dejected at finding their town in the control of the Americans. But when Colonel Clark permitted Father Gibault to continue conducting church services as usual and assured the Kaskaskians that their property was secured to them and that their liberty would be guaranteed and defended by the Americans, and moreover that France had espoused the cause of the Americans, -- then the outburst of joy and enthusiasm for the Americans knew no bounds.

In response to this magnanimous treatment by Colonel Clark, Father Gibault and Jean Baptiste Laffont, a prominent citizen of Kaskaskia, went to Vincennes in order to win the French populace of that town over to the American cause. When the people of Vincennes learned of the occurrences at Kaskaskia and heard of the proclamation of Colonel Clark, they promptly espoused the American cause.

It was this same French Kaskaskia that became the first State Capital of Illinois in 1818. But when the seat of government was removed to Vandalia in 1819, the importance of Kaskaskia began to decline rapidly.

French Kaskaskia or Old Kaskaskia (1703-1894) had, successively, four churches:

The first church was built of logs, covered with straw; it was erected at the very beginning of the settlement on the bank of the Kaskaskia River in the year 1703.

The second church was built of stone and was remarkable for its grandeur and its proportions; it was built in 1740 at the expense of the French government and was used for divine services till the year 1775.

The third church was built of timbers set perpendicular (wherefore a certain writer described it as "a monument of posts"); it was erected by the people in 1775, but pulled down in 1838 on account of its weather-beaten condition.

The fourth church was built of brick in 1838 and stood until 1894. Then, as the flood-waters began to threaten (ever since 1881), this church was dismantled and the materials were used to erect a new church several miles to the south (at the site of New Kaskaskia). The last-named church is still in use today.

The Sixth Kaskaskia, 1894-present

When the fourth Kaskaskia was established in 1703 on the west bank of the Kaskaskia River, the Mississippi River lay about two miles to the west. But the intervening land was alluvial soil which the mighty Mississippi continued to erode year by year, especially whenever it rose to flood-stage. By the year 1881 the strip of land separating the Mississippi and the Kaskaskia River just above the town of Kaskaskia had been narrowed to about four hundred feet.

Then during the great flood of April, 1881, the break-through occurred. The Mississippi began to feed its mighty current into the Kaskaskia River just north of French Kaskaskia. The narrow bed of the Kaskaskia River was of course not capable of carrying the voluminous stream of the mighty Mississippi. Unfortunately for French Kaskaskia, the eastern bank of the Kaskaskia River at this point is a cliff of solid rock. Hence the additional river-bed needed had to be carved out by washing away the western bank of the Kaskaskia River, -- the bank on which the town of Kaskaskia was situated.

French Kaskaskia had repeatedly suffered from floods. Thus in 1844 the flood-waters stood eight feet deep in the streets of the town. However, these were merely back-waters, caused by the inability of the Kaskaskia River to disgorge its waters into the Mississippi (some five or six miles below) when the latter was at flood-stage. These back-waters had very little flow or current, and receded gradually as the flood-stage passed. But now the town was brought into the path of the main current of the Mississippi River. French Kaskaskia was now inevitably doomed to gradual but complete destruction, within the next few decades, by the ravaging waters of the Mississippi River.

As the inhabitants of French Kaskaskia had to yield, year by year, to the inexorable force of the ever-encroaching might of the Mississippi River, many of them withdrew some two miles towards the south, where they established the sixth Kaskaskia, which is the present town of Kaskaskia, situated nearly in the center of Kaskaskia Island. Kaskaskia Island is about five miles square, containing some 14,000 acres of rich alluvial soil. It lies west of the Mississippi River, but it continues to belong to the State of Illinois.

Short Life-sketches of Priests active in Kaskaskia

1 6 7 3 -- 1 8 3 5

From 1673 to 1835, over forty priests were active at Kaskaskia. Some of these were the missionary in charge or, at a later period, the Pastor of the parish; others were not assigned to Kaskaskia, but lent a helping hand whenever needed by administering the sacraments (their signature appears in the Baptismal or Marriage Register).

1. Claude Jean Allouez, S.J.

Father Claude Allouez was born at St. Didier, France, in 1613; he entered the Jesuit Order on September 25, 1642, and came to Canada on July 11, 1658. He founded the first mission in Wisconsin, Mission St. Esprit (near the present site of Ashland) in 1665; also the second mission, St. Francis Xavier Mission (near the present site of De Pere) in 1669; likewise the first mission in Illinois, Kaskaskia (at the present site of Utica) in the late spring of 1673. He is therefore justly styled the Apostle of Wisconsin and of Illinois. From 1677 to 1688 he had charge of the Kaskaskia mission. He died among the Miami Indians of St. Joseph River (near the present site of Niles, Michigan), on August 27, 1689.

2. Jean Baptiste Aubert, S.J.

Father Jean Baptiste Aubert was born in France on March 1, 1722; he entered the Jesuit Order on September 7, 1739, and came to Louisiana in 1754. For five years he was active "among various Indian tribes". Thereupon he acted as Pastor of Kaskaskia from 1759 to 1763.
